

Recollecting the past few months I have to say was certainly interesting, to say the least. There hasn't been this much spark since the Presidential Election of 2008. Though the Healthcare Reform bill has been generating both strong support as well as strong opposition, it's about time that our healthcare is being set in motion. It's about time children with pre-existing medical conditions cannot be discriminated against by insurers. It's about time that high-risk individuals will not be conveniently dropped from their coverage. It's about time that we, as a society, own up to moral responsibility.

While the issue of the government making health insurance mandatory is a prevalent debate, millions of Americans will finally be able to have health insurance. If anyone can buy health insurance at an affordable rate, which is also providing the piece of mind that they don't have to pay outrageous amounts of money on top of that, then it is quite reasonable.

Although only time will tell whether these changes will reap the projected positive benefits, it is undoubtedly a step forward.
